What's happening to Arizona's Children? Usually, when the legislature is not in session, our elected representatives do not make headlines. Last week was different, as the Joint Legislative Budget Committee took issue with the Department of Child Safety. Does this mean more attention to children in Arizona? Read on...

Legislature Expecting More for Arizona’s Children?

Last week, the Joint Legislative Budget committee took the unusual action of giving the Department of Child Safety an “unfailing” grade, rather than the customary “favorable review” that most agencies get after their pre-session meeting with legislators.

You may recall that DCS is the new agency created by the legislature with some infusion of funds in 2014 for the explicit purpose of reducing and then eliminating the backlog of uninvestigated child abuse reports. This is the agency that acknowledged in 2013 that more than 15,000 cases of child abuse (some of which had multiple reports) had not been investigated—in fact, had not even been reviewed much less had a case worker actually contact the family or the person giving the report.

The director was fired; the agency was moved out of the Department of Economic Security into its own independent agency in an attempt to give greater oversight; and additional $60 million was provided to hire more case workers and reduce the backlog.

According to the testimony at the hearing Tuesday, this has not happened. And, some are questioning the leadership of the new director, including the fact that he did not personally attend the hearing to answer their questions but sent an assistant instead.

This may be an important wake-up call that could lead to some improvement in Arizona’s child care system. On the other hand, this kind of anger at an agency can become an excuse to cut budgets, and instead of fixing problems, making things even worse.

Stay tuned. Children’s issues will be big in the next legislative session. Read more about this Automatic voter registration for Arizona? Sen. Andrew Sherman, Tempe, says he will introduce this year another bill in the Arizona legislature that will make it easier for Arizonans to register to vote. This is part of a continuing effort by several Legislators to increase voting turnout, that was at an abysmal low (47%) in the 2014 off-year elections. He introduced the legislation last year, when he was a member of the House of Representatives, but it did not even get a hearing in a committee and was not even assigned to a committee until the last day of the session as a pro forma measure. (All bills have to be assigned to a committee by leadership. But if they do not want a bill to get a hearing, it is not even assigned until the last day and then is assigned to the rules committee where it is not heard). Other states have begun to pass automatic voter registration legislation in an effort to increase voting participation.

It is not particularly difficult in Arizona to register to vote, as it can be done on-line if a person has an Arizona driver's license or a non operating Arizona ID. But it could still be easier, such as permitting "same day" registration or automatic registration where the state actually reaches out to people with the forms and even the ballots that can be submitted at the same time.

Chances of passage are slim, but there may be more support for this in 2016 than in the past.

New Member of Arizona's House of Representatives

Celeste Plumlee, a long-time UU and member of the Valley Unitarian Universalist Congregation was sworn in as the newest member of the Arizona Legislature last week. She was named by the Maricopa Board of Supervisors to take the seat held by Andrew Sherman who was appointed to the Senate, taking the seat previously held by Ed Ableser, who resigned to take a position in higher education in Nevada. Here's a good story about Celeste's legislative priorities. <http://azcapitoltimes.com/news/2015/12/18/celeste-plumlee-new-lawMAKER-advocating-for-liberal-changes/>
